Because most families in North Dakota live in rural areas, home and community-based services are not always available. What is most important for these rural families is to get as much accurate information as they can about available services in order to make informed decisions for their child and family. Family Voices of North Dakota shares this information through their newsletter, website, and many presentations across the state. Family Voices is also very involved in sharing information about CHIP, to policymakers as well as families, though their involvement on the CHIP board and the Robert Wood Johnson Covering Kids project.
